

The Lighthouse

The lighthouse stood at the edge of the cliff, its lamp turning slowly against the dusk. Marta climbed the spiral stairs every evening, counting the steps under her breath. There were one hundred and twelve.

The lighthouse stood at the edge of the cliff, its lamp turning slowly against the dusk. Marta climbed the spiral stairs every evening, counting the steps under her breath. There were one hundred and twelve.

The Letter

On the fourth night a letter arrived, tucked inside a bottle that had drifted ashore. It was dated forty years earlier, and it began, "To whoever keeps the light."

On the fourth night a letter arrived, tucked inside a bottle that had drifted ashore. It was dated forty years earlier, and it began, "To whoever keeps the light."

The Storm

By morning the sea had turned grey and restless. Marta read the letter twice more, then lit the lamp early, because she knew a storm was coming.

By morning the sea had turned grey and restless. Marta read the letter twice more, then lit the lamp early, because she knew a storm was coming.